

Legal Consequences of EPAs Endangerment Finding for New Motor Vehicle Greenhouse Gas Emissions

On December 15, 2009, the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) took its most important action to date related to climate change. EPA published its final determination that the combined greenhouse gas (GHG) emissions from new motor vehicles in the United States contribute to an endangerment from climate change. More precisely, EPA found that such emissions, in the words of Clean Air Act (CAA) section 202(a), cause or contribute to air pollution that may reasonably be anticipated to endanger public health or welfare. Under section 202(a), this finding requires that EPA promulgate standards to control such emissions-as the agency proposed to do for light-duty motor vehicles in advance of its endangerment determination.
